

The shape of sport for the future

Bill Moore

billmoore@nccmail.co.nz

The Saxton Oval Pavilion's distinctive shape will help to put Nelson sport on the national and international map, Tasman deputy mayor Tim King said at the unusual building's official opening yesterday.

Shaped like an oval cylinder to reflect the athletics track and cricket ground it sits between, the $3.8 million building would be easily recognised as a Nelson identifier when events were shown on television, Mr King said.

He paid tribute to the architects, Nelson's Arthouse Architecture, and the builders from Scott Construction in Stoke, who he said would have found the job challenging but could look at it when they drove past and say "we built that".

Mr King said Saxton Field was becoming "probably one of the best sporting facilities in the country", and in one to two years the next stage would link "what's currently a bit of a wasteland" to Main Road Stoke and Richmond's Avery Sportsfields.

Nelson Mayor Aldo Miccio said the new pavilion was "truly a magnificent facility" that could be used for national and international events and would be enjoyed by generations of Nelsonians.

Jointly funded by the two councils and $700,000 in donations, the building was completed within 12 months. The $3.04 million from the two councils was split 65:35, with Nelson paying the lion's share.

The building features a central function space with large windows overlooking the grounds on both sides, three unisex changing rooms, a bar, a kitchen, public toilets and time-keeping and storage spaces.

Football will share it with athletics and cricket, and it will also be available for public functions.

Saxton Field Pavilion Trust chairman Vern Mardon said the building was completed within a year of the city council giving it the green light, after a spirited plea by Councillor Paul Matheson.

"And you know what? It's all paid for."

He said the fundraising provided a blueprint for future projects. The trust began by putting together a "very thorough and professional" case, and then put a huge amount of work into its funding applications.

The money came from a variety of sources: initially $30,000 from the Lion

Home base: The new $3.8 million Saxton Oval Pavilion can be used for national and international events.

Photos: MARION VAN DIJK/FAIRFAX NZ

End of the road: Saxton Field Pavilion Trust chairman Vern Mardon and Marion Aitken, widow of former Nelson city councillor and pavilion stalwart Colin Aitken.

Foundation, $40,000 from Nelson Cricket, and $30,000 from businesswoman Jane Sutherland, daughter of trust deputy chairman and cricket stalwart Jack Sutherland, who wanted recognition for her father's lifetime contribution to the game. The pavilion's bar has been officially named the Jane Sutherland Bar, after Mr Sutherland declined to have it named directly for him.

The trust then received $400,000 from the New Zealand Lottery Grants Board and $300,000 from the Canterbury Community Trust. The final $140,000 came from poker machine trust the Mainland Foundation, in two lots of $60,000 and a final $20,000 to meet the target.

Mr Mardon said the support from the various fund trustees, community leaders and local body officers had been tremendous.

He paid special thanks to former Nelson city councillor Colin Aitken, who had chaired the community services committee and put "hundreds and hundreds of hours into helping us get here today".

Joint effort: Nelson Mayor Aldo Miccio praises the "magnificent facility" at the opening yesterday.

Mr Aitken, who died at the beginning of the year after battling cancer, served as chairman of the regional funding forum and as both a player and administrator in a number of sports, particularly cricket, rugby and bowls.

All the speakers at yesterday's function praised his contribution to the Saxton Field development and the pavilion project.

His widow, Marion, said afterwards that it was a proud day for her.

"He would have loved it. Saxton Field was his passion."

Mr Aitken wanted to see facilities developed that the region's young people would aspire to use in their sport, and had lived long enough to know that the project was going ahead.

Her verdict on the new pavilion: "It's magnificent."